has completed the ERUA travelling seminar
What can poetry teach us about the economy?
in Paris from 03/04/2023 to 05/04/2023.

Description of the course: Insofar as economics examines the decisions, actions, and behavior of economic subjects, the economic "narrative" and the literary narrative share the same basis — human behavior, motivation and dilemmas. That is why we have introduced “literanomics” to examine the intersection and interrelation between economics and literature in the teaching and learning process of undergraduate and graduate students in Literature and Economics. The main objective of the course was to mix up undergraduate, graduate and PhD students in Economics and Literature with different nationality, mother tongue and backgrounds and to apply an innovative approach to teaching economics through understanding different forms of art (and more specifically literature) and vice versa.

Learning outcomes and acquired skills:

- acquired, broadened and deepened their knowledge of the ethical foundations, the fundamental concepts in economics and basics of economic theory;
- got acquainted with the uses and functions of literature and the heuristic, epistemological, critical values of literature;
- participated in cross-disciplinary team work and generation of ideas about the interpretation of justice, egoism, greed, depression, trust, equity, crisis, etc. from both an economical and literature viewpoint;
- developed their understanding of the economic and literature narrative and their skills for interdisciplinary analysis of social phenomena.
